Acronis.Trueimage.Enterprise.Server.9.1.3854.Q: How to test whether this is a subsurf? How can I know that a mesh is a Subsurf? For example, a torus is not a subsurf, because it has some artifacts. A: Put a small UV Sphere on the surface and check the UV Texture in the Properties panel > Textures: Then select an edge on the surface and add an Edge loop and select the same edge and the BV Hole button. Now it will look like this: There are multiple settings to control the output. Use Modifier panel > Modifiers: The option that matters here is the Subsurf Weight. When you're close to 0, the subsurf is not applied and the result is the default. To select the subsurfed vertices, you can use the Area Weight: The subsurf will not be applied at the very outer edges, as the Face is not subdivided there. A: The technique you describe looks to be similar to procedural textures and material textures. The easiest approach to test if the surface is a procedural texture is to display the surface using "front view": The procedure mesh will fill the display. Try increasing the UV size. The texture should be centered at the middle of the screen. If the display is still centered at the middle of the screen it's a procedural texture. If the texture does not fit into the UV size it's probably a material texture. The invention relates to a frequency-selective tank circuit which is particularly suited for an EPR-pulse generator. The frequency-selective tank circuit according to the present invention is especially suited for use in a monostable multivibrator which is suitable as an oscillator. A tank circuit is formed of a parallel connection of two inductances and a capacitor, which can be resonated at a predetermined frequency by means of a tuning device. The resonator circuit is closed by a transistor, which is current-driven by a control current that is supplied by a frequency-selective tank circuit of this kind. Frequency-selective tank circuits are used in particular to supply control currents to phasehave had the world's best offense, but his play this spring continued to give him a chance to continue his NFL career. The first round pick from Tennessee had something nice going at WR for the Golden Bears, but he was learning to play with his eyes and run routes, and it showed up in the spring game. He posted a 60-yard touchdown catch on a route combination that the Bears hadn't used since Marcus Cooper. Here's the run-through: In what was supposed to be a safety-heavy end zone, Golden ran the stretch and fade route combination. Tennessee's defense isn't exactly championship-caliber, so they often let the WRs make the reads. Golden read the defensive backs and made a difficult catch, slipping between two defenders at the line of scrimmage.

[Related: Bears' roster cuts: How did each player do?] Once he was behind the sticks, he was able to get into position to catch the ball and bring it into the end zone. He's still a fluid mover as he runs, and it shows up in open space. It could've come from any number of routes, but the Bears
